

Hi there!

I'm writing regarding your search for English speaking authors. My name is Sergejs Cuhrajs, I'm part Russian and part Latvian, and can fluently speak in both of these languages as well as English. I currently live in UK, where I'm studying Journalism and English (second year), with the intention to get into the mobile tech journalism industry. I live and study in a town called Coventry. It's about an hour train ride away from London so I have no problems attending press events there.

My interest in mobile phones, and smartphones in particular, started about 7 years ago with Nokia NGage. Ever since, I have been actively participating in forums, passionately discussing latest mobile events and devices, and a bit later I also started reviewing my own and trial phones. At the moment in my possession is HTC Desire and iPod Touch 4th gen, but I'm also greatly familiar with Symbian smartphones. My articles can be found in various blogs, including Symbian-freak, My Nokia blog, FoneArena and All about Meego. You can also find more about me in this interview - I think it gives a far better insight about me and my personal interests than any CV would do. Another place to get familiar with my writings is via my personal blog.

I'm also occasionally freelancing for a local tech magazine in Latvia. Understandably, it's in Latvian language, but here's one scan of my review nevertheless. Although I see a major decline in print sales, with more and more people settling to read everything in the more versatile online environment, I feel like we're also losing quite a bit. My ultimate dream would be to combine web articles with the visual layout of the print, where images and design of the page play an equally important role as the text in delivering the intended message to the reader. I'm yet to find an answer to this riddle.

Mobile-review is one of the biggest mobile related resources on the web that has lengthy in-depth reviews and, quite often, exclusive previews of upcoming products. For this reason I have been an avid reader of the site, and I also closely follow your podcasts for the many great insights in the industry.

Working at your site would be a great way for me to expose my writings to a truly global audience. To attend mobile press events, meet and make connections with people working in the mobile industry, and review smartphones is something I have been striving for ever since I realized there's more to my interest than just a plain hobby that went out of control. And it would be great if you could help me get up there - help me grow as a professional journalist!

Thank you for considering me :)

Kind regards,

Sergejs Cuhrajs
